For the People

Governor Sean Parnell
Commander in Chief

Dear Warriors,

As Alaskans, we are well aware that disaster may strike in many forms across our state. And being a resilient people, we are always ready to respond and rebuild. Recently, this resiliency was exemplified in Crooked Creek, Alaska. This community was hit hard with ice-jam flooding that destroyed 14 homes. With the help of the community and many volunteers, the destroyed homes were rebuilt, on higher ground, with climate-friendly building plans designed by the University of Alaska Fairbanks Cold Climate Housing Research Center. As a result, the Federal Emergency Management Agency designated Alaska as an example of public-private partnerships to quickly produce better housing, allowing families to start rebuilding their lives.

Alaskans also deploy beyond Alaska's borders when needed. Our Alaska Air National Guard rescue squadrons assisted the East Coast response aid to Hurricane Irene's strike. Forty-five of our National Guard members deployed to West Virginia on 24 hours notice. A C-17 with two Pave Hawk helicopters arrived on the East Coast providing aid and on-site assistance. These Airmen are continually prepared to respond to a call for help and save lives.

At home in Alaska, we are taking the initiative to ensure that Alaskans are prepared to respond to potential catastrophic events. I met with my cabinet recently in the State Emergency Coordination Center to focus on the roles and responsibilities of our departments and leaders in the event of a major disaster or emergency. Continuity within our government is essential to our preparedness and success, allowing state employees to join the recovery and rebuilding effort. Additionally, we are working to ensure individual families and households are ready. Each family needs to have a kit, make a plan and be prepared to respond to any disaster situation.

I am thankful to represent and serve with Alaskans who consistently demonstrate their resilience and the spirit of The Last Frontier.

Best regards,

Sean Parnell
Governor

Preparedness Starts Early

Preparedness starts at an early age, and we must grow it in our youth so they can be self-sufficient adults.

This fall we celebrated the cadets of the Alaska Military Youth Academy. The graduates of class 2011-2 set a school record as the largest class to graduate from the program, with 168 finishing the resident portion of the class. This is not the end but the beginning of a new life with discipline and design. We will continue to work with the cadets in a formal relationship for 12 months in the non-resident portion of the program. After this time, if the cadet is working full-time, enrolled in school full-time or a member of the military, he or she has achieved success.

Your Alaska National Guard has demonstrated success through numerous deployments. The Army National Guard's B Company, 1-207th Aviation, came back from a 12-month deployment to Iraq, flying the four-star commanding general around the theater of operations in our Black Hawk helicopters. Our commitment to mission success set a new standard for General Lloyd Austin. Our troops never missed a mission during the entire deployment. In fact, we were so detail-oriented, General Austin didn't even realize his flight crews had changed until a week into the Alaska rotation, when he noticed the different patches on our troops' uniforms.

The Air National Guard flew the last critical mile in Afghanistan this summer, supporting troops on the ground with critical supply drops that kept coalition members supplied and ready for the fight. This is the first time our C-130 pilots and crew have been flying this tactical mission, as the Air Force moves certain weapons systems from strategic positions to better support the ground mission. During the three-month deployment, our Airmen stepped up to the challenge and delivered success and support to our dedicated Soldiers on the ground. This was a very dangerous job, but our Airmen showed courage, completing every mission while keeping every crew member safe.

The veterans in Alaska add a level of knowledge to our community and serve as a model of selfless service that makes us more resilient in Alaska than any other state. The Veterans Summit was held in Fairbanks this year, and the current issues facing veterans were addressed. We are adding three veteran service officers to help 9/11 GI Bill recipients wade through the federal bureaucracy to get their hard-earned benefits. One VSO will be at each main University of Alaska campus in Fairbanks, Anchorage, and Juneau and will be available to assist veteran students and other veterans in the community as well.

We maintain the commitment to setting a national standard of excellence in preparedness from our youth to our elders, and we will do this by taking care of each other every step of the way. ■

National Guard Units Provide Needed Supplies, Save Lives

By Master Sergeant Mary Davis,
455th Air Expeditionary Wing Public Affairs

BAGRAM AIRFIELD, Afghanistan ...

Soldiers in an austere Afghanistan province received much needed provisions thanks to the joint efforts of the Alaska and New York Air National Guard units during their first formation airdrop.

Members of the 774th Expeditionary Airlift Squadron dropped approximately 20,000 pounds of cargo to Soldiers on the ground in the Oruzgan Province in June. The aircrews were tasked to perform two back-to-back missions, which tested their skills and strengthened them as a team.

"We flew a two-ship formation airdrop of C-130s supporting Combined Joint Special Operations Task Force in southern Afghanistan," said 774th EAS commander Lieutenant Colonel Rich Adams from the Alaska Air National Guard's 176th Wing in Anchorage. "We supported them by carrying food, fuel, ammunition and water to support forward operating bases in southern Afghanistan."

Despite having air crews from two separate Air National Guard units, they had one mission in mind – getting supplies downrange to combat forces on the ground.

"We delivered about 10 containers per aircraft at about 1,000 pounds per container," said Master Sergeant Timothy Griffin, a C-130 loadmaster from Buffalo, N.Y. "I ensured the cargo was balanced, so the weight was distributed evenly on the aircraft."

Griffin worked with the Army riggers at Bagram Airfield to prepare cargo pallets for the drop using the Improved Container Delivery System.

"The system enables accuracy by adjusting to wind data, terrain and other vital information affecting the airdrop," said Captain Tom Bradford, an active duty C-130 navigator from the 39th Airlift Squadron at Dyess Air Force Base, Texas. "The ICDS collects data so aircraft speed and altitude can be adjusted."

Bradford provided his airdrop expertise to Air National Guard aircrews and served as an extra set of eyes on the flight. He also operates as continuity between Air National Guard units completing 90-day rotations in theater demonstrating the Total Force concept.

"It's challenging to work with different aircrews, but one benefit is learning how people do things differently," Bradford said. "I've been deployed to this area twice, so I advise them about various aspects of the drop zones."

There is an inherent amount of risk when flying during the daytime, which is doubled when flying more than one aircraft to a drop area, said Lieutenant Colonel Chris Thurn, C-130 pilot and mission commander.

"These types of missions are typically flown at night," he said. "The second aircraft had to perform fluid travel maneuvers from the 3 to 9 o'clock positions to mitigate threats and keep from becoming predictable."

Exercises and training are a huge aspect of Thurn's work back at his home station. This helped his team perform flawlessly during the airdrop.

"As an instructor pilot and evaluator pilot, I put a lot of emphasis on training to make sure we are prepared," he said. "It's the long term effects of what we do on a daily basis that make a difference. If I can help those on the ground, I'm proud to do this."

The commander echoed Thurn's sentiments.

"We take pride in doing this, because it keeps people from having to drive in convoys. Airdropping supplies keeps people out of harm's way and keeps war fighters in the fight," Adams said. ■

Alaska Air National Guardsmen Deploy to Iraq

By Second Lieutenant Bernie Kale, DMVA Public Affairs

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... More than 30 Guardsmen from the Alaska Air National Guard's 168th Air Refueling Wing, based out of Eielson Air Force Base, departed from the United States in August to begin a six-month deployment in Iraq.

The Guard members from the 168th Security Forces Squadron completed their pre-deployment training on air bases in Florida and Nevada to prepare them for situations they may face while at Camp Victory in Baghdad.

"You always want more training," said Lieutenant Colonel Jeff Elliot, 168th Security Forces Squadron commander. "While it's been strenuous, we are as prepared as can be and ready to get our boots on the ground."

The primary mission of the deploying Guardsmen is to provide air base defense and entry control-point security.

"The security they are providing is vital to the accomplishment of the mission," said Colonel Timothy O'Brien, 168th Air Refueling Wing commander, Alaska Air National Guard. "They have been training for this type of environment, and I am confident they will succeed."

The Guard members left Alaska in early July to begin their training at Creech Air Force Base, Nev., and Eglin Air Force Base, Fla.

Some of the pre-deployment training included battle drills, entry control-point training, weapons systems, land navigation and terrain reading.

"We are extremely proud of our Airmen," O'Brien said. "They are serving our country and representing the state of Alaska with honor." ■

“Talisman Sabre 2011 basically covered the eastern coast of Australia,” said Lieutenant Colonel John McShane Jr., 49th Theater Gateway commander. “We were getting reports from as far north as Darwin all the way down the coast to Canberra.”

One of the improvements that came out of the after-action report from Talisman Sabre 2009 is that many units and personnel showed up, but nobody knew where they were in the country, which made it difficult to account for all of them. The solution was to get the 49th Theater Gateway involved in Talisman Sabre 2011.

“We took the materials and information that we had from the by-name rosters, and we worked with the combined exercise support group S-1, who were immediately notified of what units had people in country,” McShane said. “By providing in- and out-processing data, S-1 could then go directly to each of the units for strength reporting.”

McShane said that working in a joint environment was an important opportunity for his Soldiers.

“The most important thing my Soldiers learned from this exercise is that they can successfully perform their mission overseas,” McShane said. “If Soldiers from the 49th Theater Gateway should ever deploy, they will have the confidence and ability to operate their systems overseas and know they can work with anyone they encounter and succeed.”

McShane said that overall he was pleased with his Soldiers’ performance and how they dealt with challenges that arose.

“I’m very proud of the 49th Theater Gateway – the Soldiers did a lot in a short amount of time,” McShane said. “The theater gateway was only established in 2008, but since then, we’ve gotten a lot of miles under our belt. My small unit has done a heck of a lot in a short time, and I think they’ve done a great job, got some really valuable experience, and several of them were challenged, stretched and succeeded. I look forward to their continued success in the future.” ■

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... Soldiers from the 49th Theater Gateway returned from Australia after participating in the exercise Talisman Sabre 2011 in August.

Talisman Sabre, a biennial Australia-U.S. military training exercise and the largest joint military exercise hosted by Australia, involved 22,500 troops this year, as well as an estimated 18 sea vessels, 25 aircraft and 1,500 road vehicles.

Nine Soldiers from the 49th Theater Gateway merged with Soldiers from other military branches and countries to in- and out-process approximately 4,000 U.S. Soldiers, Airmen, Marines and Sailors during TS11.

Alaska National Guardsmen Receive Airman's Medal & Purple Heart

By Major Guy Hayes, DMVA Public Affairs

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... At a ceremony this July, an Alaska Air National Guardsman received the Airman's Medal for heroic actions during a June 2010 airplane crash, and a second Guardsman received the Purple Heart for wounds he received in action in Afghanistan, November 2010. Here are their award citations.

Captain Erik C. Boltman – Airman's Medal

“Captain Erik C. Boltman distinguished himself by heroism involving voluntary risk of life near Anchorage, Alaska, on June 1, 2010. On that date, Captain Boltman, having witnessed the crash of a single-engine civilian aircraft less than 200 feet away, immediately and without hesitation rushed to the burning aircraft with a fire extinguisher to fight the flames and help remove the survivors. At great risk to his person and in spite of the intense smoke and threat of total engulfment in flames due to leaking aviation fuel, Captain Boltman struggled to remove a jammed aircraft door and then pulled the badly injured pilot from the burning aircraft.

“Having the presence of mind to question the pilot on the number of passengers, he directed and coordinated actions of civilian volunteers and authorities on further rescue actions, accounting for two additional survivors. Despite the growing intensity of smoke and heat as the flames spread, Captain Boltman returned to the aircraft to assist in the removal of a fourth survivor pinned in the forward area of the aircraft. Upon learning that the pilot erred on the passenger count, Captain Boltman rushed a fourth time to the aircraft in the attempt to locate the last passenger but was driven back as the aircraft burst into flames.

Salute. A crowd of Alaska Air National Guardsmen and their family members salute as an Air Force band plays The Star Spangled Banner. The crowd was there to see an awards ceremony in honor of two fellow Guard members – Staff Sergeant Jimmy Settle, a pararescuer with the 212th Rescue Squadron, and Captain Erik Boltman, a senior director with the 176th Air Control Squadron. Settle was awarded the Purple Heart for wounds he sustained in combat in Afghanistan; Boltman was awarded the Airman's Medal for risking his life to save victims of a plane crash near Anchorage's Merrill Field.

“As response actions turned from survivor extraction to treatment, Captain Boltman rendered assistance in the treatment and safekeeping of the survivors until transported to medical facilities. Captain Boltman’s unhesitant and determined humanitarian efforts, with complete disregard for his own safety, are directly attributable to saving four lives at great personal risk to his own. The exemplary courage and heroism displayed by Captain Boltman reflect great credit upon himself and the United States Air Force.”

Staff Sergeant Jimmy Settle – Purple Heart

“On Nov. 13, 2010, Senior Airman Settle was operating as part of a HH-60 crew tasked to recover six wounded Soldiers operating in support of Operation Bulldog Bite in Afghanistan. While over the objective site, Senior Airman Settle was seated in the left door and positively identified muzzle flashes from a mud hut 400 meters to the 7 o’clock position of the aircraft. While identifying the enemy positions, he was struck in the forehead by a 7.62 mm round fragment. The force of the impact knocked him onto his back and across the aircraft so that he ended up next to the other pararescue jumper sitting in the right door. Senior Airman Settle immediately notified the crew over the internal communication system that the left PJ was hit. Unable to see, Senior Airman Settle feared the worst and quickly removed his eye protection. Once removed, his vision returned and he realized his glasses were covered in blood. The other PJ then began treating the large gash in Settle’s forehead.

The pilots quickly made the call to abort the mission due to the severity of the wound and raced Settle to medical care. In order to continue to support the operation, Settle elected to have the round fragment stitched into his forehead. Within 24 hours, Settle was returned to duty and in another fire-fight. Once the operation was complete, Settle had the fragment removed. The heroism displayed by Senior Airman Settle reflects credit upon himself, the Air National Guard and the United States Air Force.” ■

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... A cable TV show aimed at taking viewers into the intense world of military elite forces training recently highlighted the Alaska Air National Guard's 210th, 211th and 212th Rescue Squadrons.

A camera crew with the Discovery Channel's "Surviving the Cut" series filmed Guard members performing water rescue and in-air refueling operations in early July near Homer.

"Surviving the Cut" shares the personal quest of men committed to making it into the military's most coveted and elite units including Special Forces Divers, Marine Recon, Air Force Pararescue, Navy EOD, Marine Snipers and Army Rangers, according to the show's website.

Here in Alaska, the Discovery Channel featured the Alaska Air National Guard's rescue squadrons' unique ability to perform rescue operations in adverse Alaskan conditions, according to Michael Graber, "Surviving the Cut" videographer.

"It's hard not to get exciting video," Graber said. "What they do by nature is pretty extreme and high speed. The hard part is to be aware of all the moving pieces and not get in the way but also to be there when things happen."

Ready to Hoist Victims. An Alaska Air National Guard HH-60 Pave Hawk helicopter waits for a request from a pararescueman to approach the F/V Kittywake to hoist victims up during a water training exercise in June. The training was documented by a camera crew from the Discovery Channel's "Surviving the Cut" for an upcoming season.

While Graber finds the training exciting, for pararescuemen like Technical Sergeant Shane Hargis, it's the real-world missions here in Alaska that they enjoy the most.

"I like having the alert mission and know we're helping the community 24/7," said Hargis, a Guardsman from the 212th Rescue Squadron. "That's why pararescuemen like to come up here – because we are the busiest unit."

"I think that if the people of Alaska don't realize it yet, they should appreciate the fact that a phone call away, they have absolutely the highest trained and most skilled rescue personnel on the planet," Graber said. ■

Alaska Army National Guard's "ARCTIC COWBOYS" Return from Iraq

By Major Guy Hayes, DMVA Public Affairs

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... Seventy-two Soldiers from the Alaska Army National Guard returned home in July after a year-long deployment to Iraq in support of Operation New Dawn.

The "Arctic Cowboys" from B Company, 1-207th Aviation, were greeted by cheers from their friends and families after serving in Iraq transporting high-ranking dignitaries throughout the theater of operations via UH-60 Black Hawk helicopters.

The Guardsmen were assigned the essential mission of supporting General Lloyd J. Austin, commanding general, U.S. Forces – Iraq; Lieutenant General Frank G. Helmick, deputy commanding general of operations, USF-I; and Lieutenant General Michael Ferriter, deputy commanding general for advising and training.

The Guardsmen performed flawlessly, conducting 2,600 missions while logging nearly 4,000 flight hours, each one on time without a single delay in supporting a mission which included transporting the Secretary of Defense and the vice president of the United States.

For their accomplishments, the "Arctic Cowboys" Soldiers were awarded 46 Air Medals, 20 Army Commendation Medals, four Meritorious Service Medals and two Bronze Stars – a true testament to their unwavering dedication and professionalism while deployed in support of their state and nation.

"With a mission like this, everybody becomes an expert on their specialized part of the mission, and everybody knows everybody else's job," said Captain Todd Miller, commander, B Company, 1-207th Aviation. "My unit has been together for a long time, and it showed in their performance and their ability to work with limited resources and to get the mission done quickly."

The Soldiers hail from Anchorage, Eagle River, Wasilla, Fairbanks, Juneau, Haines, Bethel, Quinhagak and Kenai. ■

TESTING

VOLK FIELD, Wis. ... The Alaska National Guard's weapons of mass destruction unit deployed to Wisconsin in July to participate in a national exercise to test the Civil Support Team's ability to respond to various chemical, biological, nuclear and radiological threats.

The 103rd Civil Support Team – Weapons of Mass Destruction, based in Anchorage, joined other civil support teams from across the United States for the Joint Patriot exercise at Volk Field, Wis.

During Joint Patriot, the training scenario simulated a small town under attack by unidentified elements. The 103rd CST was tasked with setting up entry control points, as well as implementing chemical detection and decontamination areas. The goal of the training was to integrate with civilian first responders to assess the situation and provide guidance, according to First Lieutenant Joseph Radke, 103rd CST survey officer from Anchorage.

“With the constant threat of terror, not only overseas but domestically as well, there is a need for our expertise that civilian authorities may not have time to specialize in,” Radke said. “We bring to the table highly specialized equipment and personnel who are ready to respond in a moment’s notice.”

The Alaska unit, 22 members representing both the Alaska Army and Air National Guard, trains year-round in the event that a real-world weapons-of-mass-destruction event occurs. The Guard members also train with some of the 57 other CST units across the country to rehearse integration between the teams.

“This training is invaluable,” Radke said. “Not only do you become familiar with some of your counterparts throughout the United States, but it also allows you to share tactics and training methods with each other. It is easy to exchange emails and phone calls to share information, but actual boots-on-the-ground training is instrumental for our unit to improve our training and be better prepared to protect our state.”

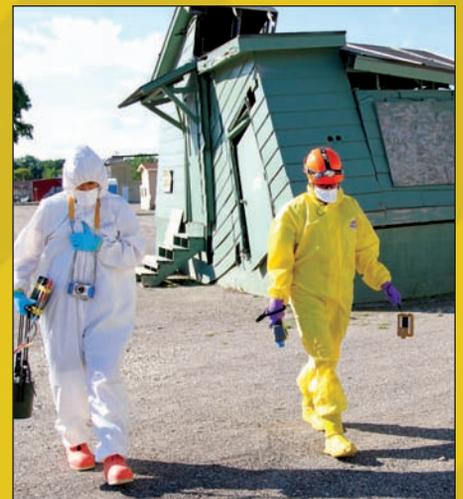

The Joint Patriot exercise also included local civilian authorities, Department of Defense first responders, FBI SWAT and Air Force Emergency Management personnel. ■ overcoming the challenges that arise when working with other nations such as language barriers and cultural differences,” said First Sergeant William Crowley, Alaska Army National Guard plans and operations non-commissioned officer, from Anchorage.

The Alaska Guardsmen joined efforts with 220 members of the Mongolian Armed Forces, 100 U.S. military and 180 international military representatives to conduct peacekeeping exercises consisting of five different events: a U.N. peacekeeping seminar, a command post exercise, a field training exercise, an engineering civic action program and a medical training exercise.

“The mission of the overall exercise was to increase the state partnership program of Alaska and the relationship with Mongolia through a multinational exercise focusing on peace support operations, a medical exercise that treated the local populace and an engineer exercise that built a humanitarian aid facility,” Crowley said.

Since 2003, the Alaska National Guard and Mongolia have been forming a relationship and plan to build on this relationship far into the future through the National Guard Bureau’s State Partnership Program.

“We are really drawing upon all the experience the Mongolians have in their peacekeeping,” said Lieutenant Colonel Paul Darling, 38th Troop Command operations officer, Alaska Army National Guard, from Eagle River. “We are learning as much Fostering international relationships and promoting positive military-to-military relations between the 16 participating countries were some of the primary goals of Khaan Quest 2011.

“Everyone brought a different experience and no one’s was better or worse, just different,” said Darling, reflecting on the important lessons learned while operating as the deputy commander of a combined joint-brigade headquarters. “The sooner you realize the strengths and weaknesses of all your partners, the stronger you’ll be as a combined staff.” ■

Alaska Army National Guardsmen Deploy to Afghanistan

By Kalei Rupp, DMVA Public Affairs

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... A dozen Alaska Army National Guard members deployed to Afghanistan in August for a year in support of an intelligence and surveillance mission.

The 12 Guardsmen, representing the aviation unit Detachment 54 of the Alaska Army National Guard, will be flying C-12 aircraft around the theater of operations to collect information for land component commanders.

“The data we collect will be turned over to the ground commanders to help them plan their operations,” said Chief Warrant Officer Five Terry Rollie. “The demand for this type of intelligence has doubled; it’s a real game changer.”

Some of the reconnaissance they will provide focuses on improvised explosive devices that make the road system so dangerous. While in Afghanistan, they will also be supporting Task Force ODIN, an acronym for Observe, Detect, Identify and Neutralize.

“Our Alaska Guardsmen will be supplying essential information to ground teams to help combat the threat down there,” said Major General Thomas H. Katkus, adjutant general of the Alaska National Guard. “This is a top-notch group of aviators and support specialists.”

Here in Alaska, the unit’s mission is the timely transport of distinguished visitors and cargo via the C-12, a military version of the King Air 200. The intelligence mission while deployed will utilize their capabilities in a new way.

“This is a really cool mission that is a complete departure from what we normally do when flying,” Rollie said.

The deployed Alaska Guardsmen call Anchorage, Chugiak, Kenai, Wasilla, Eagle River and Delta Junction home. During the deployment, they will be working with units from South Dakota, Kansas, Massachusetts, Florida and Washington, D.C. ■

Clear Air Force Station Celebrates 50 Years of Missile Warning

By Second Lieutenant Bernie Kale, DMVA Public Affairs

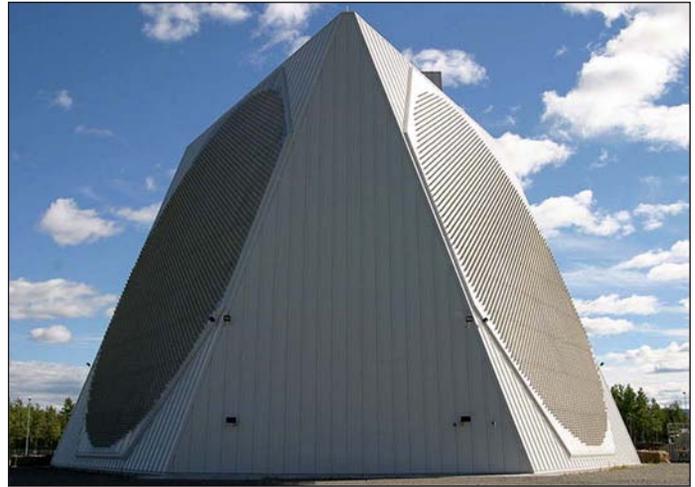

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... The Alaska Air National Guard's 213th Space Warning Squadron celebrated 50 years of inter-continental ballistic missile warning at Clear Air Force Station, near Anderson, Alaska, this August.

In 2006, the Alaska National Guard officially stood up the 213th Space Warning Squadron, completing the transition from an active-duty remote, short-tour assignment to a full-time active Alaska Air National Guard unit.

The transition marked the first time a National Guard unit had taken on a mission of this type.

"This is a great time to be a member of the Alaska Air National Guard," said Colonel Wendy Wenke, vice wing commander, 168th Air Refueling Wing. "Clear Air Force Station is such an important part of this community and our nation's defense as well."

Today, Clear comprises active-duty Air Force, Alaska Air National Guard, Canadian Air Force, civilian, and contractor personnel with a primary mission to provide early warning of ICBMs and monitoring of submarine-launched ballistic missiles, with a secondary mission to provide space surveillance data on orbiting objects.

"We have local residents who have worked at Clear for all 50 of its historical years," Wenke said. "I am certain that we will continue to proudly serve in this area for another 50 years." ■

Crooked Creek Flooding Recovery— The Housing Mission

Story and photos by Jeremy Zidek,
DHS&EM Public Affairs

CROOKED CREEK, Alaska ... Three months and 15 days after Crooked Creek residents fled the massive Kuskokwim River ice jam flooding that devastated 14 of the 41 homes in May, Samaritan's Purse and Christian Reformed World Relief Committee volunteers framed the first rebuilt home.

One day's work on Aug. 23 made visible the herculean work accomplished since the night of May 8, when Alaska's second largest river created havoc and destruction for this Western Alaska community of 105 people.

For displaced Crooked Creek residents, three and a half months seems like an eternity. Nine families are residing in tents provided by the state as transient shelter while awaiting their homes to be rebuilt. During this time, residents finalized their building sites and prepared the pads for home construction by spreading and leveling gravel. This project was a vast undertaking for the small community, requiring work around the clock to clear, excavate, transport and compact the gravel to be ready to build before the first snowfall.

For the Disaster Housing Task Force, led by the Division of Homeland Security & Emergency Management, three months and 15 days was little time to accomplish the work that led to the framing of the first house. The DHTF met for the first time on May 16, a week and a day after residents evacuated and the day before Governor Sean Parnell declared a state disaster, thus activating state recovery programs to assist Crooked Creek.

"From past experience, we knew a severely impacted small, remote and isolated community like Crooked Creek would need assistance rebuilding. That task was larger than any one organization could complete prior to winter. DHTF brought resources from many organizations together to develop a comprehensive recovery package," said Roberta Carney, DHS&EM deputy director and DHTF lead. "There has been tremendous cooperation from day one. DHTF has remained focused on our shared objective, helping residents of Crooked Creek."

Core members of the Crooked Creek DHTF include DHS&EM, Department of Environmental Conservation, Alaska Voluntary Organizations Active in Disaster, Samaritan's Purse, Christian Reformed World Relief Committee, American Red Cross of Alaska, Association of Village Council Presidents, Housing Authority, Calista Regional Corporation, The Kuskokwim Corporation and the Cold Climate Housing Research Center.

Although Federal Individual Assistance, the program that supports individuals and households affected by disasters, was not authorized for Crooked Creek, the Federal Emergency Management Agency provided staff resources and support of the public assistance program to ensure that critical infrastructure is in place. Without this effort, homes could be replaced but be left without power and other essentials.

Working with the community, DHTF knew adequate housing would have to be both climate appropriate and outside the reach of future floods. Five of the homes required relocation to lots on higher ground and the remaining four required significant elevation of the pads of up to six feet to prevent future flood damage.

"Normally, the land use permit process can take months, if not years," said John Madden, director of DHS&EM. “The Association of Village Council Presidents, The Kuskokwim Corporation, and Bureau of Indian Affairs partners prioritized the Crooked Creek land use issues and gave formal approval identifying the site upon which we could rebuild the destroyed homes. Their decisive actions enabled DHTF to complete the rebuilding plan, begin site development, and begin buying and shipping materials to Crooked Creek.”

Calista Regional Corporation, which owns Crooked Creek’s gravel pit, donated the necessary gravel to raise the homes and develop pads for relocated homes. Crooked Creek used the community’s heavy equipment and found local volunteer operators to construct the necessary building pads as their in-kind donation.

Delivering materials and supplies to Crooked Creek is difficult. The short gravel runway will not accommodate large cargo aircraft. Bulk construction material must travel by ocean barge from Seattle or Anchorage to Bethel and then get reloaded onto a smaller river barge for delivery to Crooked Creek. Low river water levels impede a heavily loaded barge and add uncertainty to the material transportation process. Because of the time constraints imposed by our Alaska weather conditions and shipping logistics, DHS&EM and Samaritan’s Purse crafted creative transportation alternatives. Some materials came by barge, but many of the truss systems were not constructed in time to make the barge. So they had to go by air to Donlin Mine, which can accommodate larger aircraft, and then flown to Crooked Creek by helicopter to allow volunteer construction crews precious time to build. Donlin Mine continues its support for Crooked Creek by contributing reserves to assist with the helicopter transportation in this concerted rebuilding effort.

The limited material delivery window also required DHTF to carefully consider materials for the rebuild. The Cold Climate Research Center, a DHTF partner, designed a series of climate-appropriate homes and a comprehensive materials list for each structure.

Volunteer organizations are essential to Crooked Creek’s recovery. Without their significant financial contributions and donations of skilled volunteer labor and essential materials, the available state assistance would not be sufficient to rebuild homes. Samaritan’s Purse and Christian Reform World Relief Committee organized 20 highly skilled volunteers to rebuild the homes. Volunteers are being housed in tents and the community’s “bus barn” with meals served at the school. The Kuspuk School

Volunteers Frame First New Home. Skilled volunteers complete the framing in one day using designs and materials customized for Crooked Creek.

District and its local staff have been very accommodating by providing housing, support, and assistance to the volunteers and state staff during the recovery efforts.

Samaritan’s Purse contributed more than $300,000 for materials and is using its aircraft to move supplies and personnel in and out of Crooked Creek. United Methodist Committee on Relief made a $25,000 donation for long-term recovery items such as mattresses, clothing, cooking utensils, and other household goods, and CRWRC has committed $5,000 for long-term recovery efforts. The Alaska Volunteer Organizations Active in Disaster and the Long Term Recovery Committee convened in June to begin the task of fund raising and determining the unmet needs of flood survivors. Because all available assistance has gone to home construction, Crooked Creek residents and volunteer agencies are seeking additional assistance for all the essentials that make a house a home.

Rebuilding Crooked Creek is possible through the perseverance of the community, the full cooperation of DHTF partners, and the many volunteers who generously give their time and expertise. With winter soon to arrive, all of the planning, site development, material ordering, transportation, volunteer management and coordination have culminated in the rebuild of homes in Crooked Creek.

“After a tremendous amount of hard work, we are seeing the light at the end of the tunnel,” said David Andrews, DHS&EM disaster assistance program manager. “By the time snow flies, we will have people in a warm place that they can call home.”

Alaska Guardsman Named Missile Defense Defender of the Month

FORT GREELY, Alaska ... An Alaska Army National Guardsman from the 49th Ground Missile Defense Battalion, Headquarters and Headquarters Battery, Charlie Crew, was named Missile Defense Advocacy Alliance Defender of the Month.

Staff Sergeant Craig Davis, a weapons operator and lead non-commissioned officer-in-charge for the Fire Direction Center, was nominated and selected as the Defender of the Month in June.

To compete, a missile defense Soldier has to be nominated and have a packet put together and submitted to the Missile Defense Alliance Agency.

The MDAA is a non-profit organization that seeks to generate public support for the continued testing, development, and deployment of missile defense systems to protect the United States and its allies and to educate the general public with respect to missile defense issues and the urgent need for it.

Because of his outstanding leadership and can-do spirit, Davis was nominated by his superiors, and his packet and biography were sent forward for possible selection.

“Staff Sergeant Davis was nominated for the award because of his high level of work ethic and high degree of professionalism in working with the Fire Direction Center crews,” said Lieutenant Colonel Joe Miley, 49th Missile Defense Battalion commander. “When I took command, I appointed a non-commissioned officer-in-charge to take care of business out there with the fire direction crews. It’s absolutely amazing what he’s accomplished. Davis has set the standard for space and missile command, ensuring that everyone earn the Army Space Badge. He started with the NCOs, and the officers soon followed. The battalion is now leading the way in space and missile defense, and it’s all based on Staff Sergeant Davis’s efforts.”

Davis will now compete against all of the MDAA Defenders of the Month for the title of Defender of the Year.

The Missile Defender of the Year is awarded to the best U.S. missile defense Soldier, Sailor, Airman and National Guardsman for the year.

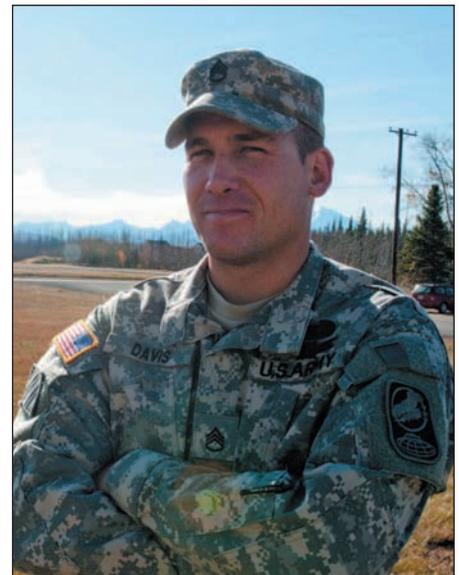

“When I was told I had been nominated by the chain of command here for the Defender of the Month, I didn’t really know too much about the award. My packet was submitted, and I was lucky enough to win for the month of June,” Davis said. “I think it’s an awesome opportunity to compete for the title of Defender of the Year. MDAA flies all of the defenders of the year from all three of the space missile defense sites to the ceremony to announce the winner.”

Davis said that it’s imperative for Soldiers to continue to strive toward success.

“If you want to be nominated for the MDAA Defender of the Month, then don’t stop working, continue to work toward your college degree, and complete your Intro to Space and Space 200 courses,” Davis said. “There are great opportunities in the 49th Ground Missile Defense Battalion if you take advantage of them. Don’t just sit out on crew, keep everything going.”

Davis will be flown to Alexandria, Va., in January 2012 for the Defender of the Year awards ceremony. ■

Soldier Rebounds from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, Hopes to Help Others

By Kalei Rupp, DMVA Public Affairs

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... For many Soldiers who return home from war, the hardest fought battle doesn't happen in a combat zone.

About 11-20 percent of Afghanistan and Iraq war veterans have post-traumatic stress disorder, according to the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. This rings true for one Alaska Army National Guardsman in particular who is sharing his story in the hope that he can help others to seek treatment and overcome the debilitating disorder.

Alaska Army National Guard Sergeant First Class Samuel Ethridge, a 22-year member of the military with four deployments under his belt, is recovering from PTSD. He's seen conflict in Somalia, Haiti, Panama and Afghanistan – experiences that have had a lasting effect.

In 1993, Ethridge experienced his first deployment, which took him to Somalia for about five months, where he served as an M-60 gunner with the 21st Military Police Company (Airborne) out of Fort Bragg, N.C. A year later, he deployed with the same unit for another five months to Haiti. There he patrolled the streets, trained law enforcement officials, and helped the government establish civil order and discipline. In 1999, he spent six months in Panama providing security at U.S. bases. Each deployment put him on the streets where he saw the effects of war first hand.

In 2000, Ethridge left active duty and joined the Alaska Army National Guard infantry unit in Hooper Bay. He soon returned to his military police roots and helped stand up the military police company in Fort Greely in 2003 before joining the 761st Military Police Battalion, Alaska Army National Guard, out of Wasilla in 2008.

That same year, Ethridge deployed for one year as part of a 16-member team of Alaska Army National Guardsmen assigned as an Afghan National Army Embedded Transition Team. While deployed, he worked directly with the Afghan National Police.

"I worked with Soldiers from other units to train the Afghan National Police in anything having to do with law enforcement as well as administrative tasks," Ethridge said. "We trained and mentored every day, working very closely."

While deployed, he was exposed daily to the brutality and dangers of war.

"I lost five of my team members in one day from an improvised explosive device," Ethridge said. "Then for the last seven to eight months of my deployment, I lost an Afghan National Police member about every other day."

Ethridge takes ownership of the losses. When talking about friends and comrades, he always says "I" lost men and doesn't acknowledge the insurgents or those who pulled the trigger or set off the bombs.

"I took each death as my fault and my responsibility; I carried a lot of survivor's guilt," Ethridge said while staring at the floor. And although he took each death personally, because of the mission at hand and his environment, he didn't grieve and just moved on through the deployment.

All 16 members of the Alaska Army National Guard returned home, and the deployment was considered a success. But Ethridge was struggling and didn't acclimate well to home life.

"I knew I was a wreck. I weighed about 145 pounds; I wasn't sleeping; I was angry and had built up a lot of rage inside of me," Ethridge said. "I didn't know what it was, but I guess I actually started to grieve and knew I needed to get help."

Ethridge said his wife of 14 years also urged him to seek help. He was immediately diagnosed with PTSD and started private therapy sessions once or twice a week. This went on for the next year and a half.

"It helped a lot, helped take the sting out," Ethridge said. "I was involved in very intensive therapy called Eye Movement Desensitization Reprocessing Level II therapy where I would basically relive each event of my past. It took four to five months, but then I started actually feeling better."

The therapy, coupled with medication, helped, and at the end of 2010, he was back to his old self, and his case was closed. But for him, the anxiety attacks returned and he relapsed. In 2011, he was tested for traumatic brain injury, re-diagnosed with PTSD and sent for treatment in San Antonio, Texas.

"They knew I needed more intense treatment," he said. "In three weeks in Texas, I did a year's worth of therapy and counseling at an inpatient program for military members."

"My command here in Alaska was very supportive and bent over backwards to help me get treatment," Ethridge said. "I think a lot of Soldiers are scared to seek help because they're afraid it's going to affect their careers, but I want people to know,

Veterans

Highly Trained, Educated Military Make Great Employees

By Verdie Bowen, State Veterans Affairs Administrator

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... Eight years ago, Time Magazine named “The American Soldier” its “Person of the Year.”

This act helped to put a face on our Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen, Coast Guardsmen and Marines. This also removed them from the politics of war and spurred our nation to provide our men and women who serve in uniform with total and unwavering support.

Now we find ourselves at the 10th anniversary of Sept. 11, and Time Magazine is unveiling another historic follow-up to naming The American Soldier “Person of the Year.”

Time Magazine is calling our service members “The New Greatest Generation.”

What this dedication and article reflect are the vast numbers of skills our returning veterans are bringing home to our local work force. Years ago, one could say that military training did not directly translate to our communities, but today, we have the highest trained and most educated military in the world.

People can benefit by partnering with veteran-owned businesses and hiring veterans. Our Alaskan veterans bring unmatched skills to employers through leadership, performance under the most trying circumstances and a work ethic that ends with great mission accomplishment rather than a time clock.

This time of year with the anniversary of Sept. 11 and Veterans Day, it is important to keep the spotlight on our veterans, their contributions in the military and the impact they are now making in our everyday lives.

It doesn't take long to see the efforts of our veterans in today's work force. Each veteran is living proof that service before self doesn't end when he or she takes off the uniform. As an employer with veterans in the work force, you have the assurance that your company's foundation is built on the best our country has to offer. ■ speaking from experience, the command is truly there to support the Soldiers and take care of them.”

“Everyone's experience during deployment is different and how each person handles the stresses of war varies, but we want our military members to know there is help available that can cater to an individual's needs,” said Major General Thomas H. Katkus, adjutant general of the Alaska National Guard. “We have excellent resources on hand and can provide useful connections to outside organizations as well. Our number one priority is to take care of our members and their families while deployed or here at home.”

Ethridge has been back in Alaska for a few months, and he said he now has the skills and emotional stability to handle his PTSD.

“PTSD is something I will always have, but after my treatment I now know how to deal with its effects so it won't interfere with my life. It no longer consumes me,” Ethridge said.

Now his focus is on using his experience to help others. His message is simple but critical.

“Get help. It's a strength to be able to seek help, not a weakness.” ■

Alaska Military Youth Academy Graduates 168 Cadets

By Major Guy Hayes, DMVA Public Affairs

CAMP DENALI, Alaska ... The Alaska Military Youth Academy graduated 168 young adults from its ChalleNGe program in August at the Dena'ina Center in Anchorage.

After a five-and-a-half-month-long residential phase of the AMYA ChalleNGe program that focuses on academics, military style discipline and training, and community service, 168 cadets graduated from the Alaska Military Youth Academy, joining more than 2,900 cadets who have graduated from the program since 1994.

Nationally recognized as a top program, the Alaska Military Youth Academy has been previously awarded the "Most Progressive ChalleNGe Program" in the nation for 2008. They are also ranked number one in the nation for contact and recruitment of high school dropouts.

"The Alaska Military Youth Academy takes these kids for 22 weeks and gives them another shot at life," said graduation guest speaker Governor Sean Parnell. "The Alaska Military Youth Academy is not just building young people; they are building Alaska's future."

The Alaska Military Youth Academy continues to intervene in and reclaim the lives of youth and produce program graduates with the values, skills, education, and self-discipline necessary to succeed as adults. ■

JOINT BASE ELMENDORF-RICHARDSON, Alaska ... The Alaska Air National Guard rescued four people from a crashed Cessna 207 carrying six individuals about 37 miles west of McGrath in August.

The 11th Air Force Rescue Coordination Center received notification from the Alaska State Troopers around 9:45 p.m., Aug. 13, of an overdue aircraft with SPOT locator coordinates placing it outside of McGrath. In addition, the RCC received reports of an emergency locator transmitter signal around the same time.

A 211th Rescue Squadron HC-130 Hercules with three “Guardian Angels” from the 212th Rescue Squadron on board left Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson at 1:24 a.m. to conduct an initial search to locate the aircraft.

Rescue efforts throughout the night were hampered by poor weather. The HC-130 was unable to get below the cloud cover and returned to Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson at 6:10 a.m.

As soon as weather permitted, a 210th Rescue Squadron HH-60 Pave Hawk helicopter carrying two 212th Guardian Angels, and a 211th HC-130 with three Guardian Angels launched around 9 a.m.

The crash site was visually spotted from the air and located in steep terrain in a wooded area. Two Guardian Angels arrived on site via a helicopter hoist. The other three Guardian Angels jumped from the HC-130 into a field nearby and were then picked up by the Pave Hawk and taken to the crash site where they also used the hoist to get on ground.

The six people on the Cessna were taken to McGrath, where two were released to Alaska State Troopers. Four were brought to Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson at 2:36 p.m. via the 211th Rescue Squadron HC-130 Hercules, then transported to an Anchorage hospital.

The National Transportation Safety Board is investigating the cause of the crash.

The Alaska Air National Guard’s 210th, 211th and 212th were credited with four saves for this mission. ■

Alaska Business Nominated for Prestigious Freedom Award

By Jamie Abordonado, ESGR

Marius Pitcher, owner of Pitcher Electric Inc. in Wasilla, was presented his Freedom Award nomination from Brigadier General Deborah McManus, director of joint staff, Alaska National Guard, during a lunch at the National Guard Armory this August.

Pitcher Electric Inc. was one of nine nominations for the state of Alaska as an extremely supportive civilian employer.

The lunch followed an orientation flight that five local civilian employers enjoyed as they rode a Black Hawk UH-60 around the Anchorage area. The five employers were from local businesses: Alaska USA Federal Credit Union, Buzz Bizz Studios, Department of Environmental Conservation, Holland America and Pitcher Electric Inc. The aircraft was crewed by Alaska Army National Guard Soldiers and provided a first-hand experience to employers on what the military mission of the men and women in the Alaska Army National Guard aviation do during their military duty.

The Secretary of Defense Employer Support of the Guard and Reserve Freedom Award is the highest recognition given by the U.S. government to employers for support of their employees who serve in the National Guard and Reserve. Nominations must come from a Guard or Reserve member, who is employed by the organization nominated, or from a family member. The award was created to publicly recognize employers who provide exceptional support to their National Guard and Reserve employees. It is the highest in a series of employer recognition awards given by the Department of Defense.

Alaska Air National Guard Welcomes New Wing Commander

By Staff Sergeant N. Alicia Goldberger,
176th Wing Public Affairs

JOINT BASE ELMENDORF-RICHARDSON, Alaska ... Colonel Donald “Scott” Wenke received the 176th Wing’s command flag from Alaska’s Adjutant General, Major General Thomas H. Katkus, at a change of command ceremony in September.

More than 500 Guardsmen and community leaders attended the event that publicly demonstrated the change in leadership of one of the country’s largest and busiest Air Guard wings.

Brigadier General Charles E. “Chuck” Foster, the relinquishing leader, expressed appreciation toward the assembled Guardsmen after serving more than three years as their wing commander.

"I want to thank you for being the kind of Airmen who make it worth it to get up early on a drill weekend, make it worth it to leave my family and deploy with you," Foster said in anticipation of the ceremony.

Katkus expressed confidence in the wing's future. "The 176th is going to continue to do great things" under Colonel Wenke's leadership, he said.

The wing commander accepted his position with respect. "It's an honor to be selected," Wenke said.

Wenke accepted the responsibility after serving 24 years in the Air National Guard. He is not new to wing leadership. He began serving as vice wing commander in April, and before that, commanded the Air Guard's Eielson-based 168th Air Refueling Wing.

In his speech, Wenke said his top priorities for the wing were its people, mission, resources and community. He also talked about what would be asked of wing members.

"As the commander, I will ask each of you to take calculated risks," Wenke said. "Remaining in your comfort zone does nothing to secure our future. For me, the road less traveled has held great rewards." ■

Prepare your motorpool for DSCA and MSCA with Phantom StormLights™

COVERT TO OVERT

Military vehicles are designed to be covert on the battlefield. Dull paint and infrared lights enhance that requirement on a deployment. When those same vehicles are called to duty on the home front, however, that coyness can lead to catastrophe! Unwary civilians can roll right up on those vehicles hidden by foliage, harsh rain or blinding snow—damaging vehicles and Soldiers alike.

When you are called for a DSCA or MSCA mission, be sure to pack a Phantom StormLight™ kit for each vehicle in the convoy! These kits include rapidly deployable lighting systems to make sure that the vehicle can be SEEN!

The Phantom StormLight™ system is comprised of lights that can mount on the windshield (powered by a cigarette lighter/accessory plug or to the BUSS bar underneath the driver's seat). Rear-end collisions are avoided by mounting another Phantom Stormlight™ to the rear bumper, drawing power from the adjacent clearance light.

Pack by Tactical Tailor®

Larger kit options include portable hand held lights, battery powered solid state MightyFlares™, road guard vests, jumper cables and tie down straps. Additionally, kits can be customized for your convenience.

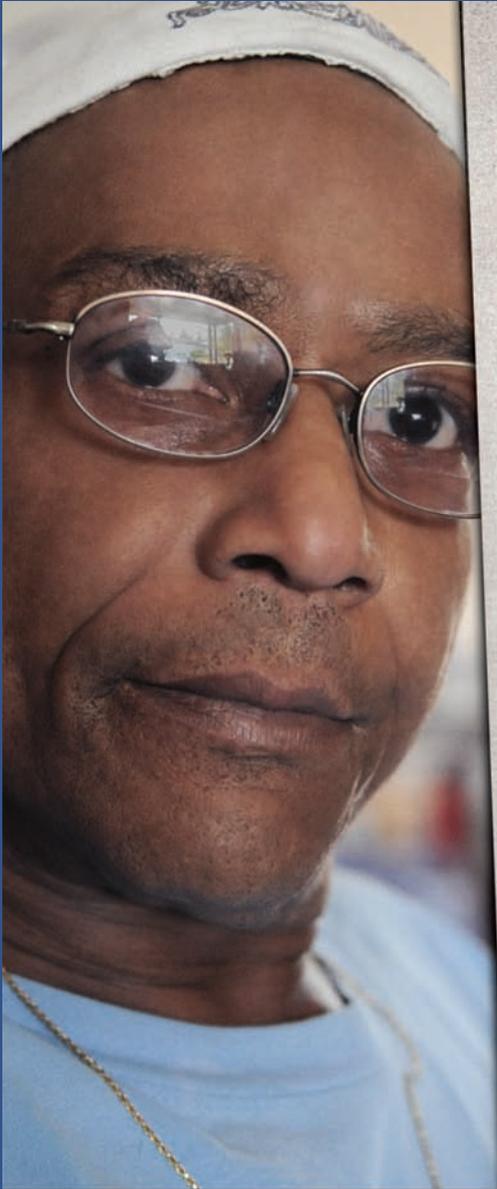

Exterior mount (LEFT) bolts to existing hole on bumper, drawing power from adjacent clearance light.

Interior mount (RIGHT) attaches to windshield with adjustable suction cups, drawing power from accessory plug.

Covert. Tactical. Durable. Phantom.
